

Science communication is the practice of conveying scientific information and concepts to the public in a clear, accessible way, using various methods like writing, speaking, visuals, and interactive activities, aiming to increase public understanding and engagement with science.

Communication Sciences is defined as the study that seeks to understand the production, processing, and effects of symbol and signal systems through the development of testable theories, containing lawful generalizations, to explain phenomena associated with communication.